Film Review: The Blood Shed
Category: Movies, TV, Celebrities

The Blood Shed

Reviewed by Anthony Thurber

The Blood Shed is about a southern psychotic family known as the Bullion family, living in northern New Jersey. This is not your typical average family, as they don't fit in with the locals. They can't stand their day-to-day aggravations with the locals. Soon their youngest one (Alan Rowe Kelly (who's also the director of this film) is having a birthday party and Papa (Terry M. West (director of Flesh for the Beast and Lord of the G String) looking to abducted people in order to please his youngest one for her birthday party. Soon everyone is invited to her party as it becomes out of control when deviant behavior and murder erupts. The film has played in various festivals including It Came From Lake Michigan and Rue Morgue's Festival of Fear.

The Blood Shed is a surprisingly good and twisted throwback to the exploitation/grindhouse genre. I thought Alan Rowe Kelly did a very good job directing and writing the screenplay for the film. The screenplay does a good job incorporating elements of strange characters that are usually found in John Walter's movies, as the Bullion clan is one of the most sick and twisted families that I've seen, in the horror genre while using the shocking aspects of horror genre and levels of gore very well, Gorehounds won't be disappointed here. There's also some dark humor in this film, which was also surprisingly good and well placed in this film. It also helped made the main characters more demented. The actors dug the material in which they were given. They had good chemistry with each other and looked that liked they were having a good time making the film.

The Blood Shed is a shockingly demented horror film that will make you think twice before messing with the Bullion family.
